Full Project Narrative/Text Description (300 words max.):

This architectural project aims to transform Pak Khlong Talat, Bangkok's famous flower market, into a lively urban oasis with a design called "Flower Hills." The idea is to create a series of gentle, hill-like structures that resemble natural landscapes, blending city life with the beauty of nature. The renovation will enhance the market's charm while adding more homes, creating a community that connects with the environment. The Flower Hills concept focuses on making a welcoming space where people can live and enjoy nature. The design will include green areas, gardens, and open spaces that encourage both residents and visitors to interact with the plants and flowers around them. By bringing nature into the city, the project aims to promote a healthier lifestyle, offering places for relaxation, play, and socializing in the busy market. The new residential spaces will provide a unique living experience, allowing people to enjoy the sights and smells of flowers just outside their windows. Features like plant-filled balconies, rooftop gardens, and shared green spaces will create a peaceful atmosphere, helping residents feel connected to nature even in the heart of the city. Additionally, the Flower Hills will become a lively community center, hosting markets, events, and activities that celebrate local culture and creativity. This renovation not only revitalizes the flower market but also reimagines city living by encouraging a lifestyle that embraces nature and community. Ultimately, the project aims to create a special place where people can thrive alongside their environment, making Pak Klong Talat a destination that showcases the beauty of both nature and urban life in Bangkok.
